THE ROTHSCHILD'S GIRAFFE

The Rothschild's giraffe is also commonly known as the Ugandan giraffe or the Baringo giraffe and it is a highly-endangered species. The Rothschild's giraffe is extinct in Sudan and only has about 13 populations left in Uganda and Kenya which means that there are only around 700 Rothschild's giraffes left in the wild.

The Rothschild's giraffe is easily identified as it has a unique pattern on its coat, the pattern is more jagged than other species of giraffes and also unlike other giraffes, they don't have any patterns on their coats below their knees.

The Rothschild's giraffes often suffer because their habitats are often destroyed when farmers cut down forests in order for them to keep livestock and grow crops on the land.

Wildlife organizations work tirelessly to protect their habitats by working with local communities to educate them of the harmful effects of taking away the Rothschild's giraffes' habitats. They also spend time helping to protect the giraffes that are still in the wild so that they can breed and numbers can start to rise again. Another issue that organizations face is the fact that not many people are aware of the fact that there are many sub-species of giraffes which means that the Rothschild's giraffe are often overlooked.

5. The Rothschild's giraffe is an extinct species.

6. In appearance the Rothschild's giraffe differs from other giraffes.

7. The giraffe's habitats are often destroyed by wild animals.

8. Wildlife organizations teach local people how to breed the giraffes.

ODD JOBS1. Pet Food Taster

One job most people would not even consider is tasting pet food for pet food companies to ensure quality. The first job requirement is to be able to eat dog food or cat food; the second is to be able to comment on its taste as a true 'foodie'.

2. Chimney Sweep

This old profession has existed since before the Victorian age and still exists today. It's still a dirty job since it deals with removing soot and ashes from chimneys, but now it differs in terms of professionalism. In the old days, children were hired to do the dirtiest work since they were small enough to crawl into tight places. Today chimney sweeps are professionally trained technicians who do more than clear your chimney of soot, they also repair the venting systems.

3. Odor Tester

Not a job for the faint at heart, or stomach — but it’s for real and companies are always hiring people who can test the performance of new products such as deodorants or detergents. As an odor tester, you are an olfactory guinea pig. As long as the industry you are in can keep producing products for you to test there will be work.

4. Mascot

Let’s face it, wearing a heavy costume in the summer heat may not be that cool, but it’s a great gig earning an income by dressing up as a mascot for a college or professional sports team, or possibly a company. Sports mascots are high performance athletes in their own right. Their role is to bring the team and fans together and keep things upbeat. According to jobmonkey.com, a full-time sports team mascot can earn around $25,000, but if they are the best in the industry they can make a six figure income depending how popular they are.

5. Pet Food Taster’s job is to taste foods and feed the pets.
6. The job of the chimney sweep hasn’t changed since times.
7. The work of odor tester is harmful for health.
8. People have sometimes make fools of themselves in the job of a mascot.
